Practical information and tips on how to address the topic of drugs and alcohol with your teenager
As teens get older they are more likely to experiment and take risks. Therefore, it is essential to start having conversations with your teen to help prepare them for making good decisions.

WHY?

- To help build resilience
- To help maintain health and wellbeing
- It is important your teen gets the correct information
- Delaying substance use leads to better outcomes long term
- Preparing and protects your teen
- Don’t assume your teen is getting information elsewhere
- Helps define boundaries
- Delaying substance use helps brain development and school performance
- Lets teens know your expectations
- They are seeking independence and need guidance
- Strengthen the relationship with your teen
- Remember: You are the most important resource, and a powerful role model, for your teenager. Be conscious of your drinking habits, attitude toward drugs, and the storage of alcohol and medication in your home.

HOW TO HAVE THE CONVERSATION

PLAN

- Prepare well: Know your boundaries and expectations around drugs and alcohol
- Have your facts right: do some research if needed
- Find a good time and include your partner where possible
- Remove communications barriers like phones, computers and games

TALK

- Be conscious of your approach: be sensitive, respectful and open to discussion
- Let your teen know you are setting boundaries because you care and want the best for them
- Work together to set boundaries, rules and consequences
- Keep the conversation positive, upbeat and clear
- Don’t forget to listen: your teen’s point of view and feelings are important
- Take advantage of prompts and teachable moments. These can happen at any time, driving the car, when eating dinner, a news item on TV etc.
- Remember, you were a teenager too. Be supportive and show empathy

FOLLOW UP

- Talk regularly and talk often, many conversations are better than a long boring lecture and the content will change as your teen develops
- Ensure they can come back to you with questions and for advice
- Don’t be afraid to enforce the boundaries you have set
